Ask the Expert

The Good Life

Millionaire in the

Retirement Planner Savings Calculator

Five Tips

Making Money 101

Moneyville

CNNfn TV

FORTUNE Fortune 500

Best Employers

Money 101

Portfolio Calculators

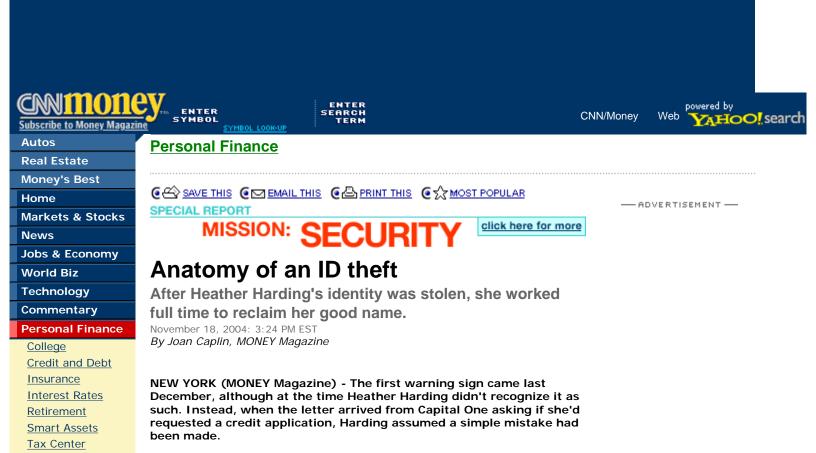

FINANCIAL TOOLS

Real-time Quotes

SPONSORED BY

Services

Last 5 Quotes

Five months rolled by without incident, but then the red flags popped up in rapid succession. A call from her bank, Wells Fargo, inquiring about her application for a line of credit. The same question from Chase, where she had no accounts. Then a message from a local Ford dealer, who said he hoped to see her later that day with the additional paperwork they had discussed.

Harding knew nothing about these transactions. Instead, she realized, she had become a victim of one of the fastest-growing crimes in the U.S.: identity theft.

advertiser linkswhat's this?-

$160,000 Mortgage for $667/

Refinance while rates are low. Compare rates and save $1000s on your... www.lowermybills.com

Get up to 4 free mortgage/refinance from 1...

LendingTree.com - Official Site

Lendingtree - Find a mortgage, refinance, home equity or auto loan now. Receive... www.lendingtree.com

Find an Online Degree

Bachelor, Master, Postgrad degrees or Certificates online from accredited...

Asset Allocator Month Mutual Funds

Money Magazine

Compare Mortgage Offers

quotes or home equity loan offers now www2.nextag.com

Anatomy of an ID theft - Nov. 18, 2004

CNN/Money Email newsletters	www.classesusa.com
Mobile news Money archives Buy story reprints Find a Mortgage	The credit inquiries, it turned out, were just the beginning. As Harding would find out over the following months, the thief had also rented a luxury apartment with a pool, a fitness center and views of the Pacific Ocean. She signed up for utilities, cell phones, Internet service and cable. She opened multiple financial accounts and ran up nearly $10,000 in bills.
SPECIAL OFFER	Yet, though the police are virtually certain they know the thief's true identity, she has not been arrested and probably never will be.
money	This nightmare, unfortunately, is all too common. Harding, 34, is one of 7 million people who were victims of identity theft in 2003, an increase of 80 percent from the previous 12 months.
FREE!	At the Federal Trade Commission, identity theft is now the No. 1 consumer complaint. Only a tiny fraction of the perpetrators are prosecuted often, as in the case of Harding's alleged thief, because there are no witnesses who actually see the suspect filling out the credit application.
Name	No one knows for sure how the criminal gained access to Harding's Social Security number, which opened the door to the thievery that followed.
Address 1	What is more important, though, is the decisive action that Harding took afterward on her own behalf steps that ultimately restored her good name and absolved her of any financial responsibility.
Address 2	Stage 1: Damage control.
City State/Province Zip/Postal	Harding took the first crucial steps in wresting back her identity even before she understood properly that she'd been the victim of a crime. At the suggestion of a representative from Capital One, the first lender to contact her last December, Harding notified the police and the three major credit reporting agencies (CRAs) that a false credit application had been made in her name.
E-mail	She also asked the agencies to place a fraud alert on her credit reports. That would supposedly prompt lenders to inform her of any new requests for credit in her name. In practice, however, it often doesn't work.
Privacy Policy	In this case, though, Harding received a flurry of unsolicited calls from lenders in May, enough to make her realize that someone was using her identity.
	She kicked her damage-control campaign into high gear. She visited the Ford dealer who had left the mysterious phone message about the need for additional paperwork. There, sales manager Othman Ghneim explained that the fraud alert on Harding's credit report had popped up when he ran a check on the young woman who had claimed to be Harding.
	His suspicions grew when he perused the report. He says, "I saw some credit there that I didn't think this girl could have. It went back too far she would have been about 10 years old."
	As she listened to Ghneim describe his encounter with her Doppelganger, Harding got chills.
	"She knew everything about me," Harding says. "She knew I was married, where I lived, that I drove a Mercedes. And she had a story for everything."
	When Ghneim found no record of Harding having owned the Ford Taurus that the imposter wanted to trade in, for instance, she explained that her husband got the Mercedes in their divorce. The real Harding has been happily married for six years.

But it wasn't until later in the day, when police paid a visit to the impersonator and found out that she lived only 20 minutes away, that Harding (whose home is in a gated community in Orange County, Calif.) got truly scared.

Until that moment, Harding says, she'd been in denial. Now she realized her security was threatened. "She could do something to my house, to my family."

Stage 2: Reality sets in.

Harding quickly put a number of safety measures in place.

She placed passwords on her legitimate financial accounts. She filed a complaint with the FTC, which provides law enforcement officials with information that will help stop perpetrators.

Harding also recontacted the police, and called the CRAs to reactivate her fraud alerts, which can expire in as little as 90 days. (For more ways to protect yourself, click here).

Filing a fraud alert with one CRA is supposed to automatically trigger all three agencies to send copies of your credit report so you can detect and fix errors.

Harding took no chances and made three separate requests for copies. She received them within a week. The one from Experian, however, was blank. It took several weeks and considerable hounding before the corrected report resurfaced.

Stage 3: Grunt work.

Victims of identity theft can spend anywhere from 30 to 600 hours recovering from the crime. Harding's experience was at the upper end of the spectrum. As is typical, most of Harding's time was spent on phone-hold or in repeated attempts to correct or make headway in matters she thought she'd already corrected or explained.

Identity-theft fallout The ripple effects of identity theft are enormous, particularly if the perpetrator gets hold of the victim's Social Security number. Here's a look at what can, and commonly does, happen.	Overwhelmed by the task at hand, Harding began taking time off from her part-time job as the director of marketing for a special-events firm. A month into her ordeal, she decided to quit for good. Reclaiming her good name had turned into a full- time career.
Lost or stolen wallet
THIEF GETS
Driver's license: Name, address, date of birth	To stay on top of the job, Harding began keeping a log of action she took to set her credit record straight. "I've worked in the special- events industry for about 15 years," she explains, "and I know details are extremely important."
Credit card: Name, card number, expiration date, security code
AND WITH THAT CAN
Go on a spending spree
Create a fake ID
Access public records for Social Security number
Buy Social Security number online	Harding's records cover 10 single-spaced pages and a spreadsheet with headings such as "date," "company contact," "time spent" and "response."
AND CAN GO ON TO
Rent an apartment
Buy a house and take out a mortgage
Apply for student loans
Purchase a car and take out a car loan	Harding sent all her correspondence by certified mail, return receipt requested.
Start utilities services

Obtain multiple cell phones
Open new credit-card accounts	requi withi letter
AND YOU MAY ULTIMATELY
Fall into credit-card debt	she'c quick
Default on loans
Get arrested	"You
File for bankruptcy	situa expla

Credit agencies, she learned, are lired by law to respond in 30 days. If she had her ers time-stamped, in effect, d improve her chance of a k response.

need to try to control the ation as much as possible," ains Harding.

Under the circumstances, Harding's quest for control was certainly understandable. In a 2003 study by the Identity Theft Resource Center, 76 percent of the respondents said they experienced "a sense of powerlessness or helplessness." Even more universal was the feeling of rage: 89 percent said they had it, as did Harding.

She began to have trouble sleeping and felt constant anxiety, "One minute, I'd be extremely angry and the next I'd be crying." In time, she even stopped socializing. "People try to understand," she says, "but it's very difficult unless you've been through it."

Creditors began hounding her, demanding payment for goods and services she'd never ordered. Getting out of town with her husband Wes became one of her few pleasures because Harding knew that then she couldn't get any phone calls.

"I was afraid to go to the mailbox or answer the phone," she explains. "I didn't know who'd be threatening me next.'

Stage 4: Righting the wrongs.

Over the next four months, Harding vigilantly contacted every company that wrongly appeared on her credit report. She'd call, e-mail or send certified letters -- repeatedly -- until the false information was dropped.

She always identified herself as a victim of identity theft, then supplied the company with a notarized ID Theft Affidavit of the crime (available at ftc.gov).

"I asked as many questions as I could, to try and piece together what [the thief] had done," she says. "I was a real reporter."

The most stressful moment: visiting the apartment complex where the suspect lived, after the manager insisted on a face-to-face meeting.

"I was terrified I'd bump into her," Harding recalls. "I was afraid [the manager] would call her down and confront her." Her worries, though, were unfounded. The imposter never appeared.

Stage 5: Recovery.

One year after Harding first became a victim of identity theft, she has finally managed to clear her name. The fraudulent accounts are closed, the black marks have been erased from her credit record, and some equilibrium has returned to her life.

Charles Juntikka, a New York attorney who specializes in credit report litigation, is impressed with what Harding has accomplished in a short time, but warns that negative data sometimes creep back into the credit reports.

Stay vigilant, Juntikka cautions, and "don't assume that once the problem is fixed, it's fixed for good."

Harding may be in a better position to prevent a recurrence than many other victims because of where she lives. California is one of just two states (Texas is the other) that allow identity-theft victims to put a freeze on their credit reports.

Now the only way a bank or other creditor can run a check on Harding is if she gives her permission via a	YOUR E-MAIL ALERTS
PIN. Under state law, Harding is also entitled to review her credit reports	Theft
for free every month for a full year to make sure there is no improper activity.	Crime
2	Fraud
In the coming year, all consumers will be the beneficiaries of greater protections against identity theft. A	Crime, Law and Justice nationwide system of fraud detection and alerts that is supposed to take effect Dec. 1 creates procedural	Or Create your own standards that CRAs must follow to ensure that future requests for credit are legitimate.	Manage alerts What is this?
It also allows victims to report the crime with a single call. In addition, between now and September 2005, everyone will be able to begin checking their credit report once a year for free. Harding will certainly be checking hers. She never wants to feel as out of control as she has this past year; she compares the emotional impact of identity theft to battered person syndrom While she hopes her nightmare has ende through an experience like this, I don't th for good."	d, she concedes, "Once you've been
* Disclaimer
Try an issue of MONEY mag	gazine - FREE!
€⇔ save this €⊠ email this €&
	TODAY'S TOP STORIES
	It's Wall St.'s turn to buy Wal-Mart falls on lowered forecast
-	"12 Days" a spendin' higher

CNNmoney contact us | magazine customer service | site map | CNN/Money glossary | press room OTHER NEWS: CNN | SI | Fortune | Business 2.0 | Time @ 2004 Cable News Network LP, LLLP. A Time Warner Company ALL RIGHTS RESERVED. Terms under which this service is provided to you. privacy policy Reprints of site stories are available.